

Schematic illustrating the impact of sea ice on the retention (absorption) of radiation from the Sun in the polar climate system. Because of the high reflectivity of the ice (and the snow if the ice is snow-covered), most of the solar radiation incident on it gets reflected away. In contrast, most of the solar radiation incident on the liquid ocean gets absorbed into the ocean, warming the system.